QUIZ

It creates a surveillance gaze, framing them as a threat to be monitored

Looking down on people in a street or park makes them look like subjects to be monitored or a problem to be managed. It strips them of their individuality and frames their presence as a loitering threat. It positions the viewer as an overseer rather than a witness.

QUIZ

Because it triggers status bias to make you judge them as scammers or “fake refugee”

Focusing through a close-up on a migrant’s phone diverts attention away from the broader context.
A mobile phone is not a symbol of comfort or privilege, but an essential communication tool, often the only link to family members left behind in the country of origin.

This type of framing also obscures a basic reality: the desire for social belonging is inherent to all people, migrants and non-migrants alike. Migrants, like anyone else, seek dignity, recognition, and inclusion, aspirations that are in no way incompatible with their legal or administrative status.
